Tony Terry is the scheduled headline performer for the AIDS benefit concert to be held at Foothill college.

By Orlando Santos
News Editor

An AIDS benefit concert will be held in the Foothill college theatre on December 21. The headline performer will be epic recording artist, Tony Terry. Also appearing will be a local R&B trio Shades of Ebony.

The event is being organized by the Associated Students of Foothill College. The main purpose of the benefit concert is to create awareness, according to student trustee, Naz Amirsoleymani. The organizers want students to become especially aware of the AIDS disease.

"We're the future of this country. If we can become enlightened then things can definitely change for the better," said Amirsoleymani.

The ASFC is still trying to get the funding needed to pull off the event. According to Amirsoleymani approximately $6,000 will be needed for the booking of the performers to cover their transportation, lodging, and food expenses.

Funding is expected to come from the ASFC, House Services from Foothill, as well as corporate funding.

The ASFC hopes to raise a net total of $12,000 assuming that the 950 seat capacity Foothill theatre is filled.

The proceeds of the concert will go to the Aris Project and the VNA (Visiting Nurse Association) AIDS Project. Proceeds may go to other AIDS organizations as well.

The event will also include speakers who will talk about the AIDS disease.

Canned foods will also be collected for donations to AIDS patients.

Tickets for the concert will be $20-22 dollars. Volunteers are welcomed to help organize this event.

For more information contact Naz Amirsoleymani at (415) 949-7657.

What is the Aris Project?

Proceeds from the concert will benefit the Aris Project. Some of the offerings of the project include:

Weekly Support Groups

Topics for small group discussions range from; People with AIDS or ARC, to Parents of People with AIDS. For times and locations, call 370-3272.

One-to-one Counseling

Trained volunteers meet with AIDS patients on an on-going basis.

HIV Counseling

Short-term counseling concerning the AIDS blood test and exposure to the AIDS virus.

Practical Support

Volunteers assist people with AIDS and ARC with daily tasks, including transportation, errands, shopping, meal preparation, and housework.

Housing Program

Low-rent housing for people with AIDS and ARC with low incomes.

Speakers Bureau

Speakers for groups about the needs of people living with AIDS and the impact of AIDS on our community.

Margaret Thatcher speaks at Flint Center

By Malia Sing
Feature/Arts Editor

Nearly a year after stepping down as Prime Minister of England, the "Iron Lady" took center stage once again, this time at the Flint Center. The indomitable Margaret Thatcher brought the sold out crowd to its feet even before beginning her speech.

During the November 12 appearance, Thatcher spoke mainly in retrospect about her 11 years in office and her views on the current state of the world. Her discussion focused on the British economy along with the human factor it involves, the Soviet Union: past and future, general East and West relations, and the New World Order.

The crux of comment on the British economy was about plans carried out by the Thatcher government from 1979 to 1990. Thatcher said initial actions taken to improve the economy included abolishing many of the controls, like foreign exchange, "quickly indeed." She also emphasized that it is the task of the government to keep the finances of the state sound. Taking into consideration the "state" of California, Thatcher quipped, "I'd rather be truthful than tactful," and proceeded to explain how state finances can be kept sound by keeping down public expenditure and supply. The remark drew a great deal of applause. A third aspect of plans to heal the ailing economy was reduced taxation. Thatcher said that before reductions occurred, 98 percent of savings were taxed. After five years of reductions the taxes were dropped to 60 percent. Within eight years a low of 40 percent taxation occurred on savings. According to Thatcher, the government tackled these problems by setting "targets" and resolving them over a five year period.

The human aspect of the economy was also addressed by Thatcher. Among her remarks were the basis for change in the economy. Part of the reason for changes in the economy was to give the English people incentive along with a chance to build up their own capital. Thatcher feels that she accomplished those two goals through several channels. By encouraging 30 percent of housing owned by private businesses to sell at a discount to tenants, Thatcher hoped to increase the number of homes owned by the common people. She also "denationalized" 44 of the nationalized industries and set aside shares in the industries at a lower price for workers. On the decision to address the human aspect of the economy, Thatcher commented, "You can't ignore human nature so, you start with the individual, then work up to the family and so on." By doing so, Thatcher also feels, "We were the first country to tackle the problem of rolling back socialism and pushing forward freedom."

In her discussion about the Soviet Union, Thatcher was adamant about defining England's role in cold war meetings. Thatcher made it clear that "England is a staunch ally with the U.S. We were not mediators between the two countries during talks."

The ex-prime minister also pondered

the promising future of Soviet youth. Thatcher said, "The younger people have not been as subject to the passivity that their elders experienced, and they are stronger for it."

Besides her general disdain for Communism in all its forms, Thatcher blames the Soviet Union's poor economic state on Communism because, "They have not set up a market economy or the laws of private property. They have not set up enough structures."

Within the question and answer session that followed, Thatcher commented on the controversial poll-tax that led to her step down from office. According to the ex-Prime Minister, the term poll-tax is incorrect. A "community charge" is what it should be referred to as. Thatcher said she refers to it as such because, "We provide services to people, not property. I thought it better we go to a tax on people." She also explained that the tax was designed to stop "extravagant local authorities" by benefitting those who needed it more directly.

When asked why she didn't fight more during her loss of popularity with the House of Commons and the English people Thatcher said, "I didn't have the stomach to fight it. I thought it was best to do what I did."

VOICE OF LA VOZ

We should worry about Duke's past

Ex-Ku Klux Klan Grand Wizard David Duke has managed to remake himself into a mainstream, if not moderate, political candidate for governor of Louisiana. This amazing transformation of ideology and image has caught the attention of the entire nation. The rest of us are looking on as the state of Louisiana chooses between an admitted racist and Nazi sympathizer or a democrat with questionable ethical qualities. While neither choice is ideal, the potential election of a former Klan member has stirred up a lot of old fears and concerns.

Despite Duke's claim that his earlier Klan doings were "youthful indiscretion," it's hard to believe that someone who was so outspoken and active in white supremacy issues could suddenly do an about face in such a short time span. As late as 1988, Duke was preaching the stance of neo-nazism in his bid for the presidency. When he received virtually no votes outside the state of Louisiana, he decided to revamp his image. He not only became a Republican, but also underwent plastic surgery on his face. The result was a whole new David Duke. Gone were the blatant attacks against minority groups. Suddenly Duke was focusing on mainstream issues of affirmative action, welfare, and governmental spending.

The evidence of Duke's long standing racism is both overwhelming and thoroughly convincing. To try to make people believe that his strong opinions were nothing more than past mistakes is insulting. Besides, how stable are the man's opinions and viewpoints if he's so willing to alter them in order to win elections. His chameleon-like changes should be viewed with great apprehension.

Voters in all states should be worried about the success of a man whose opinions depend on which way the political winds are blowing. Politicians have always tried to be everything to all people, however the line has to be drawn somewhere. Politicians should be held responsible for their past if it has bearing on their current viewpoints. After all, our past is what makes us who we are. To dismiss Duke's past as youthful folly could prove to be a grave mistake.

The last hurrah of a man we called Magic

By Vlad Olic
Editorial Editor

When Earvin Magic Johnson announced last Thursday he was infected with the HIV virus and would be retiring from professional basketball, it became one of the saddest days in sports history. Not since Lou Gehrig announced that he was the "happiest man alive" has society in general been so responsive to an ending of a sports career. Then again, this wasn't an ordinary athlete either. He was Magic.

Quite a few people are saddened by the fact that after a reported 126,000 AIDS related deaths, it took one celebrity with the pre-AIDS virus for the nation to become aware of the problem. Although my sympathies go to all those infected, that's not what this column is about.

Others point out that it was Earvin's own fault - had he been more careful and practiced safe-sex, he never would have got the disease in the first place. But that too is not the point of this column.

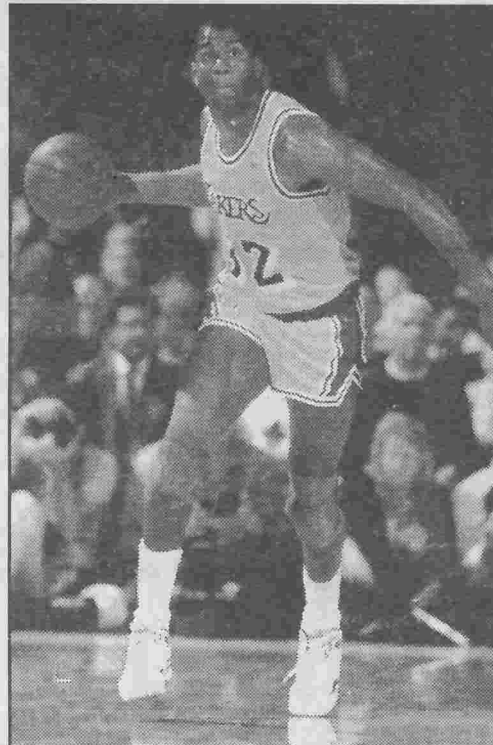

It's about a man we called Buck. The man who turned the NBA upside down when he entered it 12 years ago. The man who won five championships and single-handedly created Showtime. The only player in the history of basketball to successfully play all five positions; Earvin Magic Johnson.

There's much more to him than basketball, though. That's why Magic will be missed so dearly.

He had a special attitude towards life. Always with the trademark smile on his face, Magic spread the "I feel good" feeling on everyone around him. After all, only a couple of nights ago he told the Arsenio Hall audience that he didn't want anyone feeling sorry for him. "I've been living a dream for the last 32 years," Earvin said. That was the Magic attitude.

It would be bold for me to consider Magic even an acquaintance. The last time I saw him was last June, during the NBA finals. I remember talking to him before game five, with the Lakers down 3-1. Everyone knew that the Bulls were about to win the championship; I'm pretty sure Magic did too. But still, he was full of life and optimism, as he joked with Vlade Divac about packing for the trip to Chicago.

The trip never came to be. Nevertheless, that one instance showed the true character of Earvin Magic Johnson. Because of that optimism, we all loved him so dearly.

His influence always went far beyond the basketball court, and that made him so attractive to advertisers around the world. Magic gave basketball fans, and all others as well, that dose of optimism we all lack at times. He was a believer, and made us all believe in the good things in life too. The once abandoned "If you're good person - good things happen to you" saying, became a maxim to many of us. Yes, it was because of Magic.

With his greatness on the court and the unavoidable smile - everything seemed easy. Win or lose, he took it gracefully and went on; always searching for something new.

Tonight, when I walk into the Lakers' locker room before the game, things won't be the same. That far right corner in which Magic Johnson always used to dress up will be empty. His locker, the 3x3 territory world's premier basketball players fought for during the 1984 Olympics - as they were held in the Forum - won't be filled.

It's only been a week now, but it feels more like a lifetime. As Vlade Divac tells me, the atmosphere within the Lakers is now totally different. Although he's not there with them, Magic's presence is felt at all times.

He's gone, though; gone forever from the public eye of basketball fans. Magic's next play will be as a spokesman for AIDS awareness. That will be the new Magic, the cautious one with words of advice.

But we've seen the last of Magic, the basketball player; the one we came to love so dearly. The man we called Buck.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Many scholarships are available to help needy students

Editor,
We have just completed our selections for the fall quarter scholarships. We were amazed that the number of applicants doubled this year. We had 291 students apply for twelve scholarships offered. For one $200 scholarship alone, we had 88 applicants. It was truly a difficult task for our committee to have to eliminate so many deserving students. It tells me that the recession has hit hard since last fall.

I'd like to convey my thanks to the instructors and staff who wrote so many glowing letters of recommendation for our scholarship applicants. I'd also like to encourage qualified students to continue applying for scholarships, even knowing that the competition is hard this year. Lastly, I'd like to encourage anyone interested in contributing to, or setting up a scholarship, to contact Margaret Obenour in the Financial Aid Office, or Skip Barnes in the Foundation Office. Even modest amounts can be helpful to students.

Director of Financial Aid

Craven brings substance to horror

By Malia Sing

Features/Art Editor

You're in for a real treat, along with a couple of tricks, if you decide to see The People Under the Stairs. Wes Craven's latest creation is a feast of fright for gourmets of horror.

As expected, the film is action-packed, filled with suspense, and follows the horror flick rule of thumb, "all gore, no bore." But, there is also more substance than slaughter this time around the movie reel.

Craven adds an unexpected element of reality to People. In it, he manages to touch one of our most profound childhood fears. Nearly everyone has steered clear of that on "creepy" house in the neighborhood as a child. Craven taps into that fear and presents us with the ultimate house of horrors complete with crazed morgue owners.

Despite the misleading title, most of the movie's protagonists

"Wes Craven's The People Under the Stairs follows the horror flick rule of thumb, 'all gore, no bore.'"

are found lurking under the stairs, in the basement, and in the walls. Meanwhile, villains roam free to wreak havoc in and outside of the cursed house.

Unlike Craven's wildly successful movie sequel series Nightmare on Elm Street, People does not rely solely on one villain. In this case the battle of good vs. evil is waged on the streets of Harlem and within the confines of the infamous house.

The evil-doers include realistic representations of crack addicts and drug dealers along the streets and inside apartment stairwells. Two incestuous villains appear as husband and wife who keep a brood of tongueless and earless wretches that never see the light of day. The duo aren't as gruesome to look as Freddy Krueger, but they're every bit as despicable. In fact, they do more damage in this film, psychologically and physically, than Krueger managed to do in all of his films.

Another unlikely villain is the couple's dog. It's either a doberman pinscher or a pit bull. There's one thing I'm sure of, it's mean as hell. They feed the beast spare body parts from their innocent victims and give him a nasty taste for human blood.

However, Craven also pleasantly surprises audiences as he presents us with an unlikely hero, a seven-year-old boy, who is trying to be the man of the house. He tries keep his family from being thrown out onto the streets by taking to thievery, at the advice of a shady character, to come up with the desperately needed rent money.

Craven's latest fractured fairytale even manages to cover the subjects of greed, cannibalism, social commentary on police departments, cancer, crack addiction, growing up, doll-making, mutilation, the occasional slumlord and more, all within the span of two hours.

All in all, People is better than any other horror film out there right now. The ending is a bit too sweet, (it may cause a few cavities). But, the film is far removed from the hokey Nightmare on Elm Street series. Although Freddy Krueger may be dead, the People Under the Stairs have just begun their reign of terror.

Dons in strong contention for Nor-Cal championships
Men's soccer kicking towards goal

By Bryan Do
Sports Editor

In last Friday's game versus Skyline College, the Dons came on top in winning fashion once more as they laid Skyline to sleep with a 1-0 victory. The only goal of the game came from sophomore, Kevin Baena, who slid past the Skyline goalie to give De Anza College the goal and the victory. Coach Kulwant Singh states, "We had nice chip shots and overall good footwork. We should be in contention for the championships."

The team is currently ranked first in their division with a 17-2 record. Other teams in the division include Canada, Foothill, Ohlone, Skyline, Cabrillo, Hartnell, Gavilan, and Mission Colleges, ranked respectively in that order.

The Don's next game will be against Hartnell College on November 13 at De Anza College. With a win over Hartnell, the Dons will be in strong contention for the championship title of the Nor-Cal tournament which begins November 23. The champion of the tournament will then be invited to participate in the state championships to be held on December 7-8, (TBA).
